INTRODUCTION

The services sector is the fastest-growing sector in India and is projected to have high growth in the future. A major contributor among huge service sector is the insurance sector which plays an important role in enhancing financial intermediation, creating liquidity and mobilizing savings in the country. The Indian life insurance industry remained a monopoly of Life Insurance Corporation of India (LIC) till it was liberalized in 1999. At present, there are 24 life insurance companies operating in India with LIC being the only public sector life insurer and the balance being private players.

HEALTH INSURANCE

Health insurance is a medical insurance given by an insurance company, wherein it reimburses the medical expenses incurred for a valid hospitalization. The individual has to pay a certain amount (subject to conditions) once each year, known as premium to keep the health insurance policy active. Health insurance in India is considered same as hospitalization where the policy covers the hospitalization expenses. The expenses for hospital bed, nursing, surgeon's fees, consultant doctor's fees cost of blood, operation theatre charges are all covered. Certain diseases which are mentioned in the policy' terms and conditions shall be excluded from coverage or may be covered only after one or two years of the policy issue date. The world health report 2000 highlighted the fact that the performance of a health system affects people lives and livelihood. The challenges of the health care system are to make health care equitable and sustainable with an efficient use of resources. Increasing utilization of health services is the prime goal of developing countries like India. In Indian context health is a very important issue. Health status in India is very poor. In India, the high levels of fertility and mortality is contributed mostly by a group of states now treated termed as empowered action group (EAG) states formerly referred to as BIMARU states. These eight states are Bihar Jharkhand, Uttar Pradesh Uttarakhand, Madhya Pradesh, Chhattisgar Orissa and Rajasthan. These eight states constitute Abstract — In the textile industry, defect identification is the most crucial process for localizing Fabric Defects (FDs) and enhancing yarn quality. In earlier centuries, many techniques were discussed to identify the FDs automatically. Among those, a hybrid technique called Pairwise-Potential Activation Layer in Convolutional Neural Network (PPAL-CNN) localizes the fine structures in textile imagery through integrating dynamic AE on CNN and a PP factor in the Conditional Random Fields (CRFs). However, this CRF should be supplied a priori rather than learned. It was hard for a complex interaction between FD labels/classes while performing multiple, or long-range dependencies exist. Therefore, this paper proposes an Enhanced PPAL-CNN (EPPAL-CNN) technique to manage the complex structure interaction of FDs. First, the CRF is extended by integrating external memory strategies stimulated from the memory networks and thus facilitating CRFs for interpretation beyond localized characteristics and have access to the complete image. It encompasses the memory and Dynamic CRF (DCRF) layers. The memory layer is partitioned into input, output, and current input memory. The interpretations of input and output memory have interacted through an attention model in which weights are calculated by the relation of an input and a current input memory. Then, an outcome of the memory layer is taken as input to the DCRF layer. The DCRFs are simplified linear CRFs and are used for defining the shared hidden state and complicated relation between labels. Its factorial construction includes the relations among cotemporally labels, explicitly modeling constrained likelihood dependencies among various labels. So, a high-level Markov dependency among labels is modeled by considering the external memory. Finally, the investigational outcomes exhibit that the EPPAL-CNN achieves 92.36% accuracy compared to the PPAL-CNN technique using the TILDA database.

1 INTRODUCTION

The manufacturing of textiles is a frequently practiced regular commodity. Usually, a natural ingredient is applied to create textile fibers. The design process reveals a defect in the material's foundation. A faulty steering system or the fabric's breakage on the sewing machine may cause a structural difference between the duration of its discovery in filament, weft, or spot flaws like the misdrawing of the brace, infrastructure, inconsistency, and slab. Faults can reduce manufacturing costs by 45-65%. Weavers can inspect the textile material for highly complex flaws in classical Sewing Machines by periodically crossing a couple of machines, as every fiber fault can be prevented or remedied when detected [1].

So, the fashion domain is advanced towards the automated monitoring of textiles for specific fabric consistency measurements. Automation is a performance measurement method, which recognizes and infirms defects in production goods, often called assessments. Commonly, manual testing on wood panels is the only way of ensuring consistency and helping to repair minor flaws on a timely basis. But at the same time, strain triggers a systematic error, and minor deficiencies are always undiscovered. Detection accuracy can be exploited by the usual automated fabric analysis of about 80% than the manual assessment [2]. Thus, automated assessments are a natural solution to grow fabric productivity by reducing manufacturing costs. However, this is hard at times. Several automated fiber analysis techniques depend on machine vision tools, namely image analysis and data mining schemes which can segment and recognize the defective fabrics. The FDs identification techniques are categorized into numerical, contextual, hierarchical, composite, training, and model-based techniques. These techniques are sensitive to errors, high cost, limited to special flaws and conflicting with changes in fiber quality and context. During the past few years, many schemes have been developed for recognizing FDs.

Abstract

Data mining techniques have been applied to analyze, predict and diagnose diseases. The prediction of disease becomes meaningless when there is no proper recommendation of a drug to the patient. A drug recommendation method called Artificial Neural Network (ANN) with side effect constraints was proposed to recommend drug names for multiple diseases such as Chronic Kidney Disease (CKD), diabetic and heart disease based on the interaction between drug and disease and their side effects. In this drug recommendation method, multiple attributes of drugs and patients were collected from different sources and the hidden relationship between the attributes was predicted by using a Hidden Markov Model (HMM). In addition to this, statistical features were calculated and added as additional features. The collected and calculated features were used in ANN with side effect constraint classifier which predicted drug name for multiple diseases with the consideration of side effects. However, there is a high dimensionality problem in the recommended method due to more number of features. Moreover, it leads to more computational and space complexity in the ANN classifier. In this paper, an efficient Krill Herd (KH) algorithm for optimization is introduced to solve the above-mentioned problems in the drug recommendation method. According to the herding behavior of the likeness of the krill individuals, KH selects the optimal features. The multiple attributes of drugs and patients are collected in a different time slots. The KH algorithm is also used to select the optimal time slot. Then, the optimal time slot and features are given as input to ANN which predicts drug names for multiple diseases with high accuracy and low computational complexity.
